INTRODUCTION

The five pillars of women's empowerment are: their sense of self-worth; their right to make and exercise choices; their access to opportunities and resources; their right to have the authority to manage their own lives, both inside and outside the home; and their capacity to direct social change toward the development of a more just social and economic order, both domestically and globally.

In this context, key tools for empowering women and girls to assert their rights include education, training, awareness-raising, boosting self-confidence, expanding choices, increasing access to and control over resources, and taking action to transform the structures and institutions that support and perpetuate gender discrimination and inequality.

One method to describe women's empowerment (or female empowerment) is to embrace women's perspectives, make an effort to find them, and improve women's position via education, awareness, literacy, and training. Through the many societal issues, women's empowerment empowers and enables them to make decisions that have a significant impact on their lives. They could be given the chance to redefine gender roles and other kinds of roles, giving them greater flexibility to accomplish their objectives.

The economics and development fields now frequently debate the empowerment of women. Women who are economically empowered may use their resources, assets, and income to their advantage. Additionally, it enhances women's wellbeing and their capacity for risk management. It may lead to efforts to defend trivialized genders in a certain political or social setting. Although the terms are frequently used interchangeably, the more inclusive idea of gender empowerment refers to people of any gender and emphasizes the contrast between biology and gender as a function. Through literacy, education, training, and awareness raising, women's standing is raised. Women's empowerment also refers to their newfound freedom to make wise decisions in life that they had previously been unable to.
